

REFORM MONUMENTS.

There are two very knowing cities for themselves in the world, and they are Edinburgh and Peterhead. Edinburgh is to have a national monument to commemorate Reform. This is the second national monument that the Edinburgh folks have contrived to lay hold of, and we suppose they will make as pretty a piece of business of it as of the former. We have no desire to see another national folly. We will trust Edinburgh with our money for a monument when we see the rest of the Parthenon. Peterhead is also to have a monument—not a national monument, to be sure, but a monument to themselves at the expense of such of the nation as are liberal enough to subscribe for it. We wonder whether Earl Grey and Reform, or the Traveller and blubber were most in the heads of our Peterhead friends, when they proposed a monument on Meethill; at any rate we know that if Earl Grey and Reform headed the notice, a fine telescope and the arrival of the whale-ships in the bay came in as the tail to it. We suspect our friends, like hunters, prize the bush most; however, we are too cunning foxes to be caught. They tried us once before in the bay affair, and very nearly run us down. It will no doubt be a great matter of astonishment to the crew of the good ship, the Traveller, from captain down to cooks' mate, to witness, on nearing land, a churn stuck on the top of Meethill; but it will be a more imperishable monument against Peterhead if it allow a Tory to sit for it in the first Reformed Parliament.
