

posing Sir Michael Bruce, and though they had been beat on this occasion, yet when they had the next opportunity, they would present such a front to the enemy, as would fairly render their cause victorious.—(Loud cheers.)

Mr. Leith Lumsden of Auchindoir said, that as a sincere reformer, he felt his gratitude to the advisers of the King, in respect of this great question. His Majesty's Ministers had been drank to, but perhaps it would be allowed him to amplify on the toast, and propose "All the Members of the Government." The King had done his duty, so had his Government, it was now for the country to do theirs—(cheers)—and he hoped the electors would look to their conduct, and second the views of Majesty. (Cheers.)

Sir Michael Bruce would mention three firm friends of the measure, and who were to be the objects of his next toast,—“The Dukes of Norfolk, Bedford, and Devonshire.” (Loud cheers.) No; and we might feel quite safe when we laboured on the same side with such distinguished characters. (Cheers.) Tune, “Three good fellows.”

A great many more toasts and speeches were given on this happy occasion, which our limits prevent us from inserting.

Sir Michael left the chair about 11 o'clock, and the party immediately broke up. The meeting will, we are sure, be long remembered by all who had the gratification of being present. For our own part, it has rarely been our lot to witness an assemblage more distinguished by good feeling. The chairman acquitted himself in a manner beyond all praise,—at once courteous, manly, and piquante. The dinner was admirably laid out, and the wines were of the first quality.
