

all the the young men belonging to the Incorporated Trades, there were parties of every occupation which we could mention, not omitting the tobacco boys, poor little fellows, who mustered to the number of a hundred, all neat and clean, wearing white aprons. They were very appropriately headed by an American black, who played upon the Highland bagpipe, in a sufficiently Celtic style. In short, the walking part of the procession was beyond description, tasteful and elegant, and evinced that the managers of it had spared no pains to show every mark of esteem for the cause, and its supporter, Mr. Ross.

By half-past eight, the gentlemen of the Reform Committee had assembled at the Royal Hotel, the door of which was tastefully decorated with laurels and evergreens, having a transparency over it inscribed to "The King," with the names of "Grey, Russell, Ross, &c." the whole surmounted by the "Ship of the state," with streamers "waving in the wind." The gentlemen having taken their seats in the carriages, each of which was drawn by four horses, and having the postillions, horses, &c. decorated with flowers, and the usual election insignia of party-coloured ribbons, the procession started for the Bridge of Dee, in the following order; the bands playing, and the banners reflecting the sun's rays in the most dazzling manner:—

The following, is a more accurate account of the order in which the different bodies constituting the procession were stationed, than has appeared in any of the newspapers:—

1. Mr. Cooke, preceded by his Trumpeter both on horseback,
2. The Committee of the Working Classes.
3. The Tanners.
4. The Flax-Dressers.
5. The Rope-Makers.
6. The Founders.
7. The Curriers.
8. The Blacksmiths.
9. The Threadlappers.
10. The Bleachers.
11. The Gardeners.
12. The Tobacco Boys.
13. The Young men of the Seven Incorporations.
14. The Gentlemen in their carriages, drawn each by four horses.

The whole number of individuals who took part in the procession, could not have been under 2000.

It would be difficult to enumerate the various mottos on the banners borne in the procession, which amounted to 82.

The cavalcade having reached the Bridge of Dee, its march
