COURSE DESCRIPTION

This course engages students in a sustained exploration of the theology and practice of preaching in the context of Christian worship with a view to the wider horizon of public communication. Initial investigation of traditional and contemporary theologies of the Word prepares us to focus upon the theological and rhetorical analysis of actual sermons considered in video, audio and textual forms. We will critically examine the theological frameworks within which preaching is understood, various possibilities for understanding the relation of biblical text, contemporary context, and preached sermon, as well as questions concerning the interplay of form and content in the act of preaching. An overarching question for the course concerns the role of doctrinal and ecclesiological commitments in giving concrete shape to acts of Christian witness.

COURSE AIMS

This course aims to explore the theology and practice of preaching in the context of Christian worship with a view to the wider horizon of public communication. Focussing upon the critical analysis of actual sermons, in video, audio and textual form, students will examine the theological framework within which preaching is understood, the relation between biblical text and present context in the composition of sermons, the interaction of content and form, and the role of doctrinal and ecclesiological commitments in giving shape to acts of Christian witness.

COURSE LEARNING OUTCOMES

By the end of the course students should, at an appropriate level, be able to demonstrate the ability to:

To reflect critically and theologically upon the form, content and practice of Christian preaching;

To deepen understanding of the theology of the Word and its formative role in shaping the theories and practice of preaching;

To develop analytical capacities for conceiving preaching within the wider contexts provided by the field of Christian theology and the life and work of Christian communities.

You may base your sermon report upon ANY ONE SET of the following readings from the Revised Common Lectionary cycle for the season of Advent 2018:
