Constructive Criticism

Constructive Criticism

We need to be free, willing and able to learn by making mistakes and constructive criticism needs to offer motivation, inspiration and encouragement. Persistent destructive criticism can damage self-confidence and self-worth. It's all about how we give feedback to others and how others provide feedback to us.

Top Tips

Giving Feedback

Feedback sandwich. First give some positive context or praise, then highlight the issue that needs improvement, finish with a compliment or something positive.

Keep it brief. Refer to a minimal number of criticism points. A long list will sound like you're bombarding them.

Specific. Be clear about what specific point you are making; otherwise it might get lost in your waffling.

Behaviours. Focus on a specific behaviour that has been observed rather than giving a personal opinion. It's not personal and so shouldn't be made to feel as such.

Don't assume. It can feel personal if you make wrong assumptions about the person you're criticizing, e.g. if someone's late handing in an assignment, don't assume they're lazy or couldn't be bothered. They may have a good reason.

Time and place. No one likes being embarrassed in front of others, so be mindful about appropriate privacy and timing.

Own it. It helps to contextualize criticism within your own experiences, so try something like, "This is something I always got wrong but then I learned ..." so you can normalize the issue.

Open & honest. Being transparent helps to maintain trust, integrity and honesty.

Facts. Keep to the facts and limit emotions. People hear facts but can get caught up and confused if a message is layered with your own emotion, anxiety or stress.

Options. If you're giving criticism, offer some ideas or options that the person can take to remedy the situation; otherwise they may remain stuck with what to do next.

Be positive. Often, appropriate criticism can be miscommunicated if you deliver it negatively. Stay positive and model how the criticism is a "positive learning opportunity".

Follow up. If you've given criticism, be available to support the actions that you recommend to remedy the situation.

Receiving Feedback

Poor skills. The person giving you feedback might be inexperienced at knowing how to give constructive feedback. Show them this leaflet! Appreciate that this is a skill they may not possess.

Not personal. Much of what you hear can be negatively selective if you're anxious and mistrustful.

Learning. Embrace constructive criticism as a learning opportunity even if it hurts.

Clarification. Sometimes we react negatively to criticism because we don't understand it. Ask for clarification. You also don't have to accept feedback from others which you believe to be incorrect or inappropriate!
