Dealing with Rejection

Dealing with Rejection

Rejection is the refusal to accept, use, believe, acknowledge, to throw out, discard or rebuff. To reject something requires us to form an opinion or judgment. It can also involve a sense of loss.

We're making a choice that we don't want something. And there may be a very logical reason why we're making that judgment. But when it involves people, people have feelings. And our feelings can be hurt.

How we determine our response to rejection can be heavily influenced by our upbringing, social and cultural context, together with the value, importance and priority we place on the success or the achievement.

We are social creatures who want to belong and be accepted. To be faced with rejection is counter to this instinct and may knock our self-confidence.

Top Tips

Embrace diversity. Thankfully, we're all different. That means some of us are naturally going to be better at some things than others. It's a fact.

Reality check. Sometimes we have a misguided assessment of our chances of success. Retreat, take a step back, brush yourself down, re-evaluate, focus on the next stage, concentrate, apply and proceed.

Socialise. Much rejection is directed by others and can have the feeling of a social rejection. It can help to do something positive to engage socially; join a club, go to a social function, engage, communicate and have fun with other people.

Exercise. You can feel flat, lethargic and low in energy when you suffer a rejection. Going for a walk helps, as does running, dancing, going to the gym, swimming and pretty much any other physical activity. This helps to release endorphins, our natural 'feel good' hormones.

Drop the past. Rejection can feel worse when you automatically link it to a previous rejection or a similar trauma in the past. In this way, you fail to let go of the past and it just continues to haunt you. In this context, if the past is often being triggered, counselling may help to untangle issues.

Depersonalize. Recognize that a rejection is not personal, although it can feel that way. You just didn't fit what they wanted. Actors get it all the time; but going to auditions is a necessary part of breaking through.

Spread the load. What about applying for more than one job, asking several different people out, apply to several competitions? If you always have "another" chance, it can mitigate rejection, as you balance a rejection with the hope of success elsewhere.

Self-care. Don't deny that rejection hurts. Instead, accept it's happened, that it makes you feel lousy temporarily, and you deserve a little bit of pampering or fun. Be kind to yourself as you would to a friend.

Self-approval. The only approval you really need is from yourself. Self-respect, self-worth, self-confidence and self-belief can help. Also, see setbacks as a development opportunity! It's all about learning.

It's good to talk. Sometimes we can benefit from speaking to people about how we feel rejected... this might be to a member of our family, a friend, course leader or Personal Tutor, or someone impartial, like a counsellor, chaplain, student advisor or GP.

Self-worth. Rejection is usually a feeling we absorb as a result of someone else's actions. We might not be able to control or manage what other people do or say, but WE CAN focus on regaining self-worth, self-value and self-confidence.
