Emotional Intelligence

Emotional Intelligence

IQ is regarded as intellectual intelligence (Intellectual Quotient) and EQ refers to emotional intelligence (Emotional Quotient). Emotional Intelligence is about “being intelligent about emotions”. Intelligence, as we know it, is based on the qualifications we achieve academically and the intellect this gives us to make cognitive decisions.

But we also have a heart that shapes how we connect and communicate with other human beings. Our life will be defined by how well we get on with others and build strong relationships, at home, university and life beyond.

Top Tips

Self-awareness. Do you understand the nuances of when you're sad, depressed, happy, distraught, elated, isolated, lonely, feeling down, enthused, deflated, apathetic and so on? Each conveys a defined emotion in response to a specific set of circumstances or variables. Identify the cause and effect.

Self-management. Do you know how and why you manage your emotional feelings and responses at any given time? What is necessary, sufficient, reasonable and appropriate? You decide.

Social awareness. Have you grasped how and why others feel and express the emotions the way they do? What are their triggers or cues? Do you understand and appreciate where they're coming from?

Active Listening. Are you really listening to what others are saying, not just the words, but the unspoken messages behind the words? Use all your senses to listen (visual, tonal, body language) and reflect back your understanding of what the other person is saying to clarify and demonstrate that you have heard them.

Motivation. Are you self-motivated and know what drives or inspires you to get on and succeed? What do you need to allow this motivation to lead you? What excites you and why? This creates passion and self-belief in yourself and others.

Sorry. If you make a mistake or say something inappropriate, apologising is an important conciliatory response that can help to build appreciation, openness, trust and honesty.

Non-judgmental. If you stereotype or rush to form your own personal opinion about others, you're making a judgment that can give you a misinformed reality of the person. Be open, transparent and accepting of other people's needs and wants.

Individuality. Get to know the real people you interact with; their loves, their hates, what inspires them, what demotivates them.

Friendships. Who are your real friends and why? They are often people who energize rather than sap your energy, who give you new perspectives and stimulate your thinking. How can you spend more time with them?

Stress management. How you deal with stress affects people around you, at home and work. Know your stress triggers and learn to adapt or manage them better.

Parallel-talking. When someone tells you something about them or their life, and you reply with your own similar experience, you're ignoring them and what they have said. This is not empathy as you're pulling the focus back on you.

Trust. Trust is a two-way street – trusting yourself and trusting others. You can't learn to trust others if you haven't learned to trust yourself.

Consequences. Understand the emotional consequences of your actions. How will people feel about, or emotionally react to, the decisions you make? What are the alternatives?
