Time Management

Time Management

At the heart of time-management is the concept of prioritisation. We have to prioritise a series of tasks to determine how we schedule what we do. It's about what's important to us and, if we do not complete an action, the cost or consequence to us.

We devise a strategy based on information about the task. We understand that we need to know what the task is, any potential deadline, how long might it take and how or why we might prioritise. This starts to add up to a lot of decisions. Bingo! Time management is totally impossible without the ability to make decisions. And by not making decisions, we procrastinate.

Top Tips

Aims and objectives. Ask yourself: where are you starting from and where do you want to get to?

Work smarter, not harder. It's about the quality of the work you do in the time allocated, not necessarily the amount of time you spend. It might be more productive to give yourself short blocks of time to work, say thirty or forty-five minute segments, have a break, then start again.

Urgent and important. The aim is to clarify here what's urgent and important, what's not urgent but important, what's urgent but not important and what's neither urgent nor important. The aim is to work on tasks that are not urgent but important, so by good time management we deal with them before they become urgent.

Daily "to do" list. Plan for the day so you don't get surprises ... but also build in time for surprises!

Deadlines. Do you need to build in a "false" deadline to kick yourself into gear? Do you find that you leave work until seconds before the deadline or do you plan to meet a deadline with some buffer time left over?

Commitment. Determine how long each task might take and what is required of you.

Early finish. If you aim to make the deadline with seconds to spare, think of the stress you put yourself under. Is it not better for you to build in some buffer time or leeway?

Advice. If you have difficulties structuring time for academic work, ask for guidance from your Personal Tutor, a peer, someone from your School or maybe a Mentor who has gone through your academic experience.

Social Media. This can be a source of great fun, intrigue and entertainment. It can also sap you of masses of time. Be ruthless about limiting time on social media. Some people find it helps to limit social media to particular days or time-slots.

Pace. Understand what time you need to complete a task – what's required by one person may be different to another.

Learning. Get some guidance from Student Learning Service if you're struggling with learning styles, procrastination or other inhibiting learning habits.

Have a break. You need to recharge your batteries to give yourself energy to complete all the tasks in your schedule. Have a break that's actually restful, calming and relaxing, such as going for a walk, standing to stretch, reading a good book or listening to music which helps you chill out.

Expectations. Manage the expectations of others, especially those who may waste your time. Be assertive about what you are able to work on..
